The recently discovered comet for some days has been visible in the early morning from 2 o'clock on until dawn, and has appeared as a hazy star with faint tail in the northwestern sky. With the telescope the comet is a beautiful object, with a tail five or six degrees long, very slender and neatly shaped. A bright starlight nucleus shines in the head, surrounded by a nebulous glow of light. A group of small stars can be seen some distance back of the head shining through the gauzy train without any perceptible diminution of their lustre. The comet attains its greatest brilliancy to day, and from now on will be visible in the evening, setting less than an hour after the sun, but it will be 400 times as bright as when discovered, which may somewhat to make it one of the finest fair grand opening of the grounds about the 5th of July with trotting and pacing races. without man, no had laid aside his own with a quick sense of relief.

This playing at merrymaking irked him, as his grave eyes showed.

A Twelfth Night ball was always expected at The Hollies, so its new master gave it, if in secret unwillingly enough.

The evening had gone wearlly to him until this little moving holly-bush arrived to pique his curiosity.

The "Dryad of the Holly" people were soon calling her in the ballroom, and no one wondered that the master were soon calling her in the balfroom, and no one wondered that the master of The Hollies almost took possession of er-no one, that is, except the master

But he was presently asking himself the meaning of it all.

"I am not a fool to let myself be haunted so by the thought of Margery," he was saying to himself. "Margery, who refused me quite coolly and easily last year—Margery, the little maid of the mill, who can have nothing in common with this guest of mine. And yet a trick of gesture, a tone of voice, dis-guised as it is, sets me to dreaming of Margery—Margery!"

He murmured the name half-aloud, finding himself for a moment alone in the library—or thinking he was alone the library—or thinking he was alone, for he missed the slight waving of the curtain over one of the book-lined al-

A moment ago, Margery, standing just where he was now, had drawn her undirected letter from her corsage, had directed it in a trembling hand to "Philip Brand Wodrington," and had Oh! ah! oh! Kerchew! kerchew! sealed as it was, uppermost among his little pile of letters, and then earing some approaching sound, she nad fled away to the nearest portiere, hoping to escape, only to find herself curtained into a shailow alcove and The old woman turned from setting the tea-kettle on the kitchen hearth to Philip entering the room. For an instant, she could not resi the temptation to glance through the mantle trailing from the shoulder, and the snowy powdered hair that fell down over it in one long half-curled coil. But there was nothing wintry about the little April face, half smiles, half tears, that looked up at old Betty. "My child," the letter said—"my little daughter who will never know me—when you read this you will be eighteen, and you will have grown up a true child of the kind people who have promised me to take care of you—a girl who can work, and not fall or die, as I have failed and am dying, when there is nothing but work left for my helpless unaccustomed hands. Now that you are old enough not to be harmed by the knowledge, you ought to know that, as the phrase goes, you are well born upon your mother's side—a Wodrington, the rightful heiress of The Hollies, a country-seat close to the little village of—near Guilford. But my father cast me off because I married the man I loved, who was not well born, in the Wodrington tashion, but the truest gentleman and the bravest heart that ever woman leaned upon. If Ralph Lane had lived, he would have won for himself such a name that my father must have repented his harshness. But he is dead, and my father in my stead has adopted my cousin, Gilbert Brand, whose son is to bear the name of Wodrington on country of age." The old woman took off her glasses "Eh, Miss Margery..."

"No, no, Betty! You'll never miss me, as I've often told you. I can never forget the fourteen years I thought I was your grand-child—the fourteen years you cherished me as seldom was grand-child cherished. And this evening, grant I am thinking of them...more The year before we left the old mill, granny. The year—Philip Brand was

There were a few words more of loving counsel from the dying mother to the child; but Philip did not stop to read them. He had laid down the letter with that mention of himself. He was walking up and down the room restless-ly. Twice or thrice he muttered a broken sentence or two: "At once-the child must be found! Hideous usurpation?"
He flung himself into his chair again,

And began writing hastily a letter to his lawyer, telling him of this strange bit of information of Alice Wodrington's child, of whom he heard to-night for the first time, and who must be traced and given her rights.

It was but a half page, and he signed his name to it—"Philip Brand Wod-

Then suddenly he put her a little the berries on her dress.

He would have liked to assert his wnership as he did before; but this time he restrained himself, and said:
"But The Hollies. I have just learned that The Hollies belong to—" He stared at her as if he had not un "You? Margery, my darling, my or

"Yes-Margery Wodrington Lane-or, Philip, since it is Twelfth Night, what you will." "I made sure as your mother 'ud tell you, dear, in this letter kept for you till this very Christmas Day that's gone."

Betty was taking it out of a little old-"What I will!" He had her in his arms again, the hollies and all. "What I will! Then it shall be Margery Lane Wodrington, my wife!"
